This method is often used before an encrypted communication has been made: The PKI is then used as seed for each encrypted communication; this is a bit like the way in which you send random data by putting a number of digits into a cell phone, after which the phone gives the number, the same as sending an SMS. This means that you can send messages, which has very useful consequences when communicating directly. This is also the method used to create a digital certificate, which can be signed with this PKI. Finally, to prevent eavesdropping as well as encryption it is important to store the PKI on your public key. This would also allow multiple PKI's to exist, which means no two machines sharing the same PKI key would see each other and so we cannot use an ECDSA signature to ensure that one machine's can't see how the other manages things.. In a previous post I discussed data loss at the expense of the security model. We have seen how to create a reliable and secure data storage scheme, but what if it breaks on occasion? How do we deal with this? The idea is that we can simply create an alternative scheme for the lost data.

First option involves an AWS Route53 public key (PKI). This can be used to generate a unique key for each resource on your Elastic Beanstalk which can be used to decrypt the data. Using this PKI instead of a plain text key is pretty clever, since even if anyone can recover the key from it, a password reset is still possible..
